I reviewed this with Allen Harris, and we are not sure just how much information we should convey to the man.

I feel that we should tell him and then arrange for him to discuss the situation with our examining physician, if he so desires. I know that probably there would be questions that I personally could not answer that our Company Doctor could easily handle. I also realize the danger of unnecessarily alarming a person concerning a situation.

If permissable, I would tell this man that his X-ray did show a deviation and that our Doctor would frankly discuss it with him.

Please advise if this would be in order, or advise what action if any we should take.

Thanks — Paul D. Burnum
