Subject Tomoe Inquiry re Hair Dryers

The attached bulletin is the latest information on the hair dryer situation. Basically, the CPSC has made a preliminary determination that a hazard may exist and is conducting a public information program. Most of the manufacturers are voluntarily moving to stop manufacture of such dryers and offering to replace at least the part containing the asbestos insulation. The situation is well described in the CPSC's own words:

> "The inclusion of a hair dryer model on this list does not represent a determination by the Commission of whether the model presents a health hazard. In the exercise of its statutory duty to inform consumers, the Commission is notifying the public of which models are believed to contain asbestos. In that way, consumers will be assisted in making decisions, as to their own actions, while further testing is proceeding to determine the nature of any attendant hazard that may be present. The Commission also notes that the information on this list was supplied by the manufacturers and private labelers of the dryers and has not been independently verified by the Commission or its staff." (Emphasis added)

The technical information that we have seen shows that the asbestos levels present from dryer use are far below the levels that can be measured by the OSHA procedures for occupational exposure. The dryers are also used only a few minutes at a time so average exposures would be even lower. The NIOSH testing upon which the CPSC is planning to make a final decision is now expected to be completed in August.

In specific response to the Tomoe question, I do not see any dryers manufactured in Japan with resin compounded with asbestos that are affected. The closet approach to this would appear to be a couple of Clairol models that use a "resin impregnated asbestos-based paper as a decorative element in the intake airstream, but not the heated airstream."

CPSC BULLETIN

This is an updated list of hair dryers that contains information supplied by the manufacturers or retailers. A final list will be released later with all the information concerning asbestos in hair dryers that the Commission obtains from the industry.

The staff of the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) is conducting an investigation to identify those electric hair dryers that contain asbestos materials and to determine any hazard associated with those products. This is a partial list of (I) dryers that are believed to contain asbestos and (ii) dryers that are believed not to contain asbestos. Where possible, the Commission is indicating the current policies of manufacturers and retailers regarding their products. As the Commission obtains additional information identifying other hair dryers both with and without asbestos, it will continue to notify the public.

The inclusion of a hair dryer model on this list does not represent a determination by the Commission of whether the model presents a health hazard. In the exercise of its statutory duty to inform consumers, the Commission is notifying the public of which models are believed to contain asbestos. In that way, consumers will be assisted in making decisions, as to their own actions, while further testing is proceeding to determine the nature of any attendant hazard that may be present. The Commission also notes that the information on this list was supplied by the manufacturers and private labelers of the dryers and has not been independently verified by the Commission or its staff.
